• Executive Summary

This report presents the findings of an Exploratory Data Analysis (EDA) conducted on a bank marketing dataset containing 11,162 customer records. The objective was to identify customer characteristics and campaign factors that influence term deposit subscriptions and provide recommendations to improve future marketing strategies.

• Data Preparation

The dataset was examined for data quality issues before analysis. No missing values or duplicate records were found. Data types were validated, and the dataset was prepared for exploratory analysis.

Key Findings

- The dataset contains 11,162 customer records and 17 features.
- Customers with higher account balances showed a greater likelihood of subscribing to term deposits.
- The age group between 30 and 50 years represented a significant portion of successful subscriptions.
- Certain job categories demonstrated stronger conversion rates compared to others.
- Marketing campaign effectiveness varied across different contact methods.
- Customer demographic characteristics played an important role in subscription decisions.

Business Recommendations

- Focus marketing efforts on customer segments that demonstrate higher conversion rates.
- Allocate more campaign resources to communication channels that produce better results.
- Develop personalized campaigns targeting customers with stronger financial profiles.
- Improve customer segmentation strategies based on age and occupation.
- Continuously monitor campaign performance and optimize outreach strategies using data-driven insights.

Conclusion

The analysis highlights several customer and campaign-related factors that influence deposit subscriptions. By targeting high-performing customer segments and optimising their communication strategies, the bank can enhance marketing efficiency, increase conversion rates, and maximise its return on investment (ROI).
